Data privacy concerns present a risk for nearly all organizations, whether they are collecting, storing, and using customer data for sales or marketing, or employee data for human resources purposes. The constantly evolving patchwork of state, national, and international data protection and breach notice laws can give rise to untold liability for well-meaning businesses of all types. Due to the rate at which the legal landscape is changing, even well-crafted privacy and internal security policies will almost assuredly become inaccurate or outdated over time.

At Bast Amron, we regularly advise clients regarding compliance with existing state, national, and international data privacy laws, including states' various data protection and breach notification statutes, the Federal Trade Commission Act, and the General Data Protection Regulation, as well as forthcoming or proposed laws which may affect our clients' practices.

We also guide our clients through the potentially far-reaching effects of an inadvertent data or security breach. Because our litigators are versed in data privacy, we are able to help position our clients in the manner best suited to mitigate their risk and avoid the expense, distraction, and liability associated with the litigation that often follows a breach.
